The Youthful Future

Some time ago, our town's government presented the idea of a festival of young people's startups, and not just that, but of those helping shape a better future. Time passed, and now I can visit it and share my opinion on what I've seen.

When I first arrived, there was a lot to unpack: neon lights, screens, schemes etc. But what caught my eye was a metropolitan model. It consisted of an above ground train track, a city map underneath it, station marks in certain places and a lot of detailed descriptions.

Firstly, I have never seen such a detailed metro model ever. Secondly, I had no idea it could fit our city. And thirdly, as it wasn't unique enough, it was the biggest start up of the festival.

In my opinion, if this startup was to become reality, it would completely change not only the everyday life of our hometown, but the whole transportation industry in our country, as such systems were previously only built by the state. An issue that was commonly discussed with the visitors was the plan being too ambitious. "Surely, this would be a miracle," one man said - "but the ticket prices would be sky high."
