Undeniable Reality and Unprecedented Fiction of Jane Baker Lex.

Interviewer: Dear readers, in this issue our newspaper's interviewing a remarkable author Jane Baker. Jane, good afternoon!

Jane Baker: Good afternoon, thanks for invitation.

I: Our pleasure Jane, this year you're preparing to parting with something truly personal, aren't you? Lex.

JB: Yes. Autumn's nostalgia led me to the small coastal town where I ~~was~~ <sup>had been</sup> brought up. Under impression, I decided to credit it with being a setting for my new book. Lex.

I: And what have you observed after so many years decades of residing overseas?

JB: Abandoned buildings, ruined parks and complete disappearance of people. No more scattered shops, fishing boats and exhilarating fairground attractions. I was taken aback. Lex.

I: Sorry to hear that, yet it's hard to conceive one point. How haven't you come across any one in the town? St.

JB: Actually, I have. In early hours of my arrival I faced a boy with a backpack approaching his grandpa's house. But no one more that's it.

I: sounds astonishing and intriguing for an the upcoming work. Can we hope that the boy will

I: Could you mind sharing it with us?

lex.

JB: Unfortunately, his speech has provided a grounding for the plot therefore I won't reveal much. What struck me most was the fact that it were kids who insisted on moving out of the town. They signed an (of course) informat "petition" establishing as a beginning of rocking the boat.

I: Unbelievable! The genre must be a horror than then.

JB: You know, I prefer adventurous stories, however this time it'll be still a children-oriented book but a spooky, mystical one with sad gloomy strings attached.

lex.

I: Thank you, Jane

JB: Likewise.
